Sets of magazines dealing with topics of the day are in constant demand at the library reference desk. Among these magazines the Forum is perhaps the most in demand because of its wide range of topics and the practical and succinct manner in which they are presented. Its articles treat of the latest phases of politics, economics, science, history, philosophy and literature and its contributors are largely men of affairs as well as scholars and those who are vitally interested in their respective subjects. The popularity of the Forum seemed to call for a more complete index than the general magazine indexes afford, one in which each article should be given an author entry and as many subject entries as the nature and variety of its topics might demand.
